

Revolution: A Reader

It also occurs to me that growing up gay turned this grim “war cry” into a sort of foolish comedy, since nothing projected at me ever got even close to “what I am.” No one could hit my target market. Two things: boy was I pissed when the 1980s and ‘90s brought my demographic into the fold, and I got inundated with products for gay people. Still, they never got me right. Second, I think most people are peculiar enough that the market is always stupid about them. The easiest to fool are the straight men, but the rest of us get to spend our time laughing.

<http://revolutionreader.com>